

SC03 – INT. SUBWAY PLATFORM – NIGHT

A late-night subway platform, empty except for flickering fluorescent light and the distant rumble of an approaching train. MARA VOSS (30s, guarded, still in her transit-authority jacket) stands near the platform edge, facing DEACON REYES (40s, calm, dangerous) six feet away.

A poster for a missing person – Mara's face, ten years younger – hangs torn on the tiled wall behind them.

DEACON

You always did like the last car. Furthest from the cameras.

MARA

I stopped caring about the cameras when you started showing up in my dreams.

He takes one step closer. Wind begins to stir the platform trash – the train is close.

DEACON

I'm not here to relitigate. I'm here because the Bureau wants to know the same thing I do.

MARA

What happened to the money?

DEACON

What happened to you.

The train's headlight sweeps the tunnel mouth behind Deacon. Mara doesn't flinch.

MARA

I disappeared. That's what happened to me.

The train roars through the platform – does not stop – a wall of light and noise. In the stroke of passing windows, Deacon has closed half the distance. When the train clears, he's close enough to touch her.

DEACON

(quiet, under the fading roar)

Then disappear again. Tonight. And this time
I go with you.

Mara studies him. Somewhere behind them, a station announcement crackles, unintelligible.

MARA

You'd hate it. No cameras to perform for.

A beat. Then, for the first time, Deacon almost smiles.

CUT TO: